Dear Hiring Manager,

instashop's retention problem is one I have been on the other side of. I am a brand that sells on q-commerce in the UAE — talabat, Noon and Careem — so I spend my time on the question your CRM function asks every week: what actually brings a customer back, and how would we know it was us? That is why this role caught my attention, and why I want to be direct about where I am strong and where I am not.

Starting with the gap, because it is the one that matters: I have not worked in Braze, have not owned a lifecycle journey inside a CRM platform, and have not run push, in-app or SMS as my own channels. What I have built is the thinking the platform executes. At DoFreeze I own our Shopify D2C business end-to-end — customer base, segmentation, EDM, merchandising and checkout — and run it for repeat purchase and average order value, not traffic. I A/B test creative, audiences and offers on Meta and Google Ads and move budget on what the data says; Salesforce has been in my stack since Miravia. The platform is what I would have to learn; the customer logic I already do.

The habit I would bring is measuring retention honestly. Running SMASH with talabat, I did not report the campaign's own numbers — I held Befit as a control brand on the same platform and window: SMASH went from AED 355 to 940 in daily revenue, +165%, holding at roughly double afterwards, against +4.7% for the control. On Noon, 'New Year, New Me' delivered +4,176 incremental units, +31% over baseline. I designed a purchase-to-enter cashback activation with talabat, which is a frequency mechanic dressed as a giveaway. At Miravia (Alibaba) I created 'Beauty Club', a loyalty programme built for repeat purchase, and analysed conversion, traffic and retention across 42 accounts. I have also audited an agency's reporting and found reach estimated from follower counts — so I check how a metric is built before I trust a dashboard.

I am based in Dubai on a UAE residence visa and know the q-commerce customer here from both sides — inside a platform at Glovo, and as a merchant on talabat, Noon and Careem. If you are open to someone who would need a ramp on Braze but arrives fluent in the business, the segments and the honest measurement of retention, I would very much like to talk. Thank you for your consideration.

Best regards,

Paula De Francisco Pérez
