Dear Hiring Manager,

Every January I run "New Year, New Me" for Befit, the better-for-you brand I manage at DoFreeze in Dubai, a consumer moment FITNESS knows well. I am applying for the Brand Manager role because what you describe, turning brand strategy into an activation calendar that several markets can execute and then proving what worked, is the job I do today. I would like to do it on brands with the reach of NESQUIK, FITNESS and CHEERIOS.

At DoFreeze I own the annual activation calendar for three food brands sold in more than 50 markets: Ramadan, back to school, Fitness Month and New Year, plus six product launches run end-to-end from brief and packaging to pricing and go-to-market. I write the creative briefs for my team of two, a designer and a social media executive, and for four external agencies. Across three creator campaigns I negotiated 30% off and received 103 creator activations against 75 contracted. Plans are built with sales and our distributors channel by channel, across modern trade, quick-commerce and our own online store. Before Dubai I sat on the customer side, with 42 brand accounts at Miravia (Alibaba) and XL accounts at Glovo, which taught me what a retailer needs to hear in a sell-in. I started in category planning at Mondelez, working with Nielsen data.

I measure campaigns on sell-out, not on reach. For SMASH on talabat I used Befit as a control brand, same platform and same window with no creators, so the result means something: daily sales rose 165% against 4.7% for the control. On Noon, "New Year, New Me" delivered 4,176 incremental units, 31% over baseline. When an agency's report estimated reach from follower counts and counted the same creator twice across waves, I rebuilt the KPI definitions and found that micro-creators under 20K followers were performing 10 to 40 times above the campaign average. That is the post-campaign review your role asks for, and the habit I would bring to the cluster.

To be clear about the gaps: I have not worked inside a global matrix, taking a global brand strategy and cascading it to a cluster, because at DoFreeze I am the centre and adapt plans market by market. My media experience is paid social, search and creators rather than TV or a media agency. Those are the parts I would expect to learn from your team; the activation, briefing and measurement work I can do from the first week. I am based in Dubai on a UAE residence visa and would welcome a conversation. Thank you for your consideration.

Best regards,

Paula De Francisco Pérez
