

Brand & Launch Lens — Huda Beauty Global Campaigns

Three observations on 360 launch execution for a community-first global beauty brand.

1. Hero vs. sub-hero launch architecture

Finding: A 360 calendar with both hero and sub-hero launches competes for the same creative, paid and influencer resources.

Insight: Sub-hero launches often underperform not because of the product but because they inherit a scaled-down hero playbook instead of a purpose-built, lower-cost motion.

Recommendation: Define a distinct sub-hero playbook (tighter creator set, owned + e-commerce content led, lighter paid) so sub-heroes get a fit-for-purpose launch — I run exactly this tiered launch logic across six NPD launches at DoFreeze.

2. Influencer activation as the conversion layer, not just awareness

Finding: Beauty lives on creators, but influencer activity is frequently measured on reach rather than on sell-out and e-commerce conversion.

Insight: Tying creator briefs to specific launch SKUs and tracking through to e-commerce conversion turns influencer spend from awareness into measurable revenue.

Recommendation: Brief creators against launch SKUs with trackable links and post-campaign sell-out analysis — I built an influencer programme from zero to 25–50 creators per campaign at DoFreeze and led the Beauty Club / Hot on Social projects at Miravia.

3. Consistency across a global, cross-functional calendar

Finding: Hero and sub-hero campaigns ship across messaging, paid, in-store, e-commerce and PR — coordinated with Creative, Product and Commercial and global teams.

Insight: The biggest execution risk is drift: the same launch looking and saying different things across touchpoints and markets.

Recommendation: Run each launch from a single brief and asset tracker with a cross-functional check before go-live — the cross-functional coordination I do daily leading omnichannel campaigns at DoFreeze.

These are outside-in observations from a beauty marketer who admires the brand; with Huda Beauty's campaign data I'd sharpen them fast. They reflect how I build launches — tiered playbooks, conversion-tracked influencer, and one consistent brief.
